

How to Work with an Executive Search Consultant

Suzanne Teer, WittKieffer

As an executive search consultant, I often work with candidates who are well suited for a given position but don't always understand my role in assisting their candidacy. While my primary responsibility is to the client, it is an important part of my job to build a great slate of candidates and to shepherd those candidates through the entire job search process. I want candidates to shine and succeed.

Whether you are new to working with a search consultant or have some experience, this article provides some "dos" and "don'ts" to help you engage with a search consultant with success throughout each stage of the process.

Initial Inquiry

When you learn about a new leadership position, your first step should be a conversation with the search consultant. Even if you are confident it is a position that you want to apply for, slow down and reach out to schedule a call. When candidates apply for positions without talking to the search consultant, it can create an impression that you are applying without much forethought. And, more importantly, the consultant is a valuable resource that you can tap.

In your conversation with the consultant, you may learn some important insights and nuances about the position that may be helpful to you in deciding if this opportunity is a good fit for you and in preparing your application materials. In addition, the conversation gives the search consultant an opportunity to get to know you.

Resume and Cover Letter

Use the insights you glean from your conversation with the consultant to help shape your resume and cover letter. Here are sample resume templates which you may find helpful: Sample Resume 1; Sample Resume 2.

Tailor your resume or CV and cover letter to the organization and position. Demonstrate that you have done your homework, understand what the organization is looking for in its next leader and have the experience and qualities to do the job. The following resources may be helpful:

- How to Write a Resume Like a Healthcare Executive
- Your Step-by-Step Guide to Making the Perfect Resume \(with Examples\)
- Physician Executives: A Resume Can Make the Difference

I am surprised by the number of errors I see on resumes and cover letters. Likewise, some resumes are very hard to navigate and far too many are simply lists of responsibilities rather than an outline of accomplishments and ways you have made an impact on your organizations. Ask someone you trust to be honest with you to provide feedback on your resume and letter of interest. If you are not certain about the length and level of detail expected, ask your consultant for their input.

Consider these other tips to ensure your resume says “Hire me.”:

- Remember that your resume is a marketing document for yourself and your capabilities. Make it sharp, crisp and full of useful information. Pay attention to the design and feel of the entire document.
- Focus on the future more than the past. Emphasize experiences that are most relevant to the position you hope to hold next.
- Quantify your experiences when possible. Employers like to see some data—i.e., what results and successes you can show in numbers.
- Good examples of resumes about on the internet, so use Google to your advantage to see others' resumes.

Again, remember that your resume does not have to be a static document. Update it regularly as your career goals change, and don't be afraid to tailor it to a specific job that you are aiming for.

LinkedIn Profile

A complement to a strong resume or CV is a clear and detailed LinkedIn profile. Most employers these days will expect a candidate to have a LinkedIn presence that reflects the resume. Make sure that the items and details you chronicle in your resume are consistent with those you have on your LinkedIn profile. If the job titles, dates, descriptions and so forth do not match between the two, it can be a red flag for employers. Ask your search consultant to review your LinkedIn profile for advice.

Phone Screen

A consultant will often want to conduct a phone screen to get to know you better. This call can be part of your initial inquiry or may come at a later stage, perhaps after you have applied. While different than (and shorter than) a full-fledged phone interview, be prepared for an in-depth call of up to 30 minutes or perhaps more. Although you may see the call as a great opportunity to sell yourself, remember that the consultant has key questions they need you to address to help determine if you are a good fit for the job. Resist the urge to monopolize the conversation. Let them guide the conversation so they can ask the questions they need to ask. Be brief but thorough in your responses. And as much as possible, tell stories and share concrete examples that illustrate your accomplishments.

Be prepared for the common questions: Why are you interested in this particular position and institution? What are some specific examples of the impact you have had on your organization? What questions do you have for me? Do your homework on the institution and read the position profile carefully. Come with a few thoughtful questions for the consultant—they illustrate your approach and how you think about things.

Internal Interview

Our firm often conducts internal interviews with candidates we believe are well suited for a position before we present the slate of applicants to our client. This enables us to explore their background and experience in more depth and provide insightful feedback to our clients. Take this interview as seriously as you would an interview with the client. All of the same rules apply. If you haven't interviewed in a while, now is the time to brush up on your interview skills—there is an art and science to conducting a strong interview. Your interview may very well be conducted by video. There are important considerations for video interviews—again, do your homework.

In-person Interviews

In a typical search process, there will likely be two rounds of in-person interviews: a first-round interview that is typically a brief interview with the hiring manager or search committee, and a second, final-round interview that may involve an all-day schedule of meetings with stakeholders across the organization. Often your search consultant will schedule time to prepare with you so you know what to expect. They want you to succeed as much as you want to succeed! If your consultant doesn't offer a call to prepare, ask for it. Be sure to ask your consultant questions that they are uniquely prepared to address—composition of the search committee, insights into key influencers in the interview process, logistics for the interview and the timing of next steps, for example.

Communication and Follow Up

Communication with your search consultant is important throughout the entire search process, especially as follow-up to an interview stage. Get in touch with your consultant if you have questions or new information to share. If your schedule changes, you are having second thoughts or you become involved in another search, let your consultant know. Likewise, if you have questions you are reluctant to ask of the search committee or hiring authority, talk with your consultant. The more information your consultant has, the better he or she can serve you and their client.

Discretion is an essential quality of a successful search consultant. If you are invited back for a final interview and are having serious doubts about pursuing the opportunity, contact your consultant right away. He or she can talk through the situation with you and help you determine next steps.

When you are asked to submit references, complete an on-line survey or submit additional information, take care of these tasks right away. Your responsiveness demonstrates your interest and attention to detail and helps keep the process moving efficiently. Search consultants really do want the best for our candidates and our clients. If the match isn't the right one, no one wins. Likewise, if all goes well throughout the process, and you are in fact well-suited for the position, your search consultant can be a very strong advocate for you.

In Closing

Although we work on behalf of our clients, we cannot do our jobs well without great candidates. We are highly invested in your success, too.

The way you handle yourself through the search process say a lot about the care and attention you will demonstrate in your new role. You make an impression at every step in the process. Let every point of communication and engagement with your search consultant reinforce your professionalism, thoughtful approach, quality of your communication skills and attention to detail.

The best-case scenario? You get the job and enjoy great success in it. The worst case? You don't get the job but now you have a search consultant who knows you well and will be ready to assist you when the next opportunity comes along.

About the Author

Suzanne Teer is a senior partner with the executive search firm WittKieffer. Based in the San Francisco Bay area, Suzanne supports leadership searches for presidents, vice presidents, provosts, deans and other key roles across all academic areas, with particular expertise in science, research-oriented and engineering-related searches as well as advancement and philanthropy searches. Her clients include top-tier research universities, independent research institutes, public regional universities and leading private universities. Suzanne brings to her search work extensive experience in fundraising within the field of education spanning top-tier research universities, academic medical centers, liberal arts colleges and independent schools.

Suzanne Teer, Senior Partner
831-621-4904 | suzanne.teer@wittkieffer.com

About WittKieffer

WittKieffer is a global executive search firm dedicated exclusively to organizations that improve quality of life in healthcare, education, the life sciences and the not-for-profit sector. Its industry-specialized consultants deliver solutions across the leadership continuum – experienced, emerging and interim – that build long-term partnerships and successful outcomes. The firm understands leadership, people who lead and the impact they have on organizations and society. Visit WittKieffer.com to learn more.

About NALHE

The National Association of Latino Healthcare Executives is a national organization led by Latino/Latina executive leaders of U.S. hospitals and healthcare organizations and experts in the fields of health care policy and practice. NALHE was founded in 2005 to increase senior-level Latino/Latina representation in hospitals and health systems in the United States. Our goal is to create a future workforce of highly talented Latino/Latina healthcare executives who can meet the challenge of delivering and improving healthcare in our diverse communities. Visit nalhe.org to find out more.